Chanler and Johnson Ticket Will Suit Him.

ATTRACTS GREAT ATTENTION

Watterson Has Written More Democratic Platform, State and National, Than Any Other Democrat Alive—He Has Evidently Sprung His Dark Horse.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19.—The interview given out in New York a few days ago by Henry Watterson, declaring that Chanler and Johnson would suit him as well as any ticket, has attracted more attention in Washington than any other political event of the week. The great Kentucky editor has written more Democratic platforms, state and national, and been prominent in the work of naming more successful candidates of his party than has any other Democrat alive. No other living American is listened to with keener interest by all sorts and conditions of politicians in the national capital than is "Marse Henry."

When, early in the summer, he announced that he was grooming a dark horse that would run under the wire in 1908 several lengths ahead of the Republican nominee, whoever that might be, Washington sat up and took notice. The Kentuckian started a guessing contest here that reached even into the White House. For several weeks Col. Watterson continued to speak and write cryptically of his candidate. Finally, he described rather indefinite geographical limits as the range of his dark horse. "He lives west of the Alleghenies and north of the Potomac and Ohio," said Marse Henry when persistently pressed for a fuller description of his dark horse. This narrowed the guessing bee down somewhat as it eliminated the southern man's idea from further consideration. Mr. Watterson's next concession to the guessers was that the last time he had seen his candidate he had "a dark mustache."

Weeks passed before Col. Watterson relieved the tension by declaring that he had had in mind all the time Governor Johnson of Minnesota. It so happened, that Governor Johnson's physiognomy is as innocent of beard as a new born babe's, nor has the executive of the North Star State worn even a mustache for a decade or more. When he was a breezy and enterprising country editor at St. Peter, Minn., Governor Johnson permitted nature to take its course so far as his upper lip was concerned, but curiously enough he parted with his mustache soon after he began his notable public career—a career which has attracted the attention of Washington and aroused expectations here that Johnson will be a figure in national politics next year to woe in the Democratic camp.

The linking of the names of Lewis Stuyvesant Chanler and John Johnson by so experienced a President-maker as Col. Watterson has created something akin to sensation at the capital. It represents a combination of interests, both substantial and sentimental, which Washington recognizes as being calculated to appeal with telling force to the nation. Both are young, and each has achieved a victory in his own state that is unique in character and so patently indicative of the popularity of both as to require no argument to establish the fact. As all other elements of the country's population are represented in Washington in about equal proportions, sectional considerations play virtually no part in calculations here on the Presidential outlook. At the same time, however, note is made of the fact that Governor Chanler's southern ancestry is a factor of great importance in that it meets fully whatever may be the strength of the movement to restore to the south its old-time place in the national political equation. Governor Johnson lives in that quarter of the country where concededly the Democratic party must look for growth, and where its ascendancy was becoming fixed until William Jennings Bryan embroiled his party in warring factionalism that did not cease until Johnson developed such marvelous qualities of leadership.

The Scandinavian element is nearly as strong in the Dakotas, Montana, Idaho and the State of Washington as it is in Minnesota. Thus Governor Johnson's name on the ticket with Governor Chanler would, it is confidently believed in Washington, draw from the Republicans a very considerable part of the vote in the northwest upon which that party has depended in the past for its victories in the states named.

As Washington is convinced that Secretary Taft as President Roosevelt's avowed choice, will hold the Republican ticket, the capital is now more concerned over the question of Judge Taft's running mate than any other feature of Republican politics. Should nothing befall Governor Curtis Guild in the contest in Massachusetts next month it is almost universally believed here that he will be the Republican Vice-Presidential nominee. For years Governor Guild has been as intimate a friend of President Roosevelt as Secretary Taft is.

However, if by any chance Governor Guild should fail of re-election next month his name would be stricken from the slate by the President-makers in Washington. At the present moment, however, they have made the slates for 1908 with Taft and Guild on the Republican side and Chanler and Johnson on the Democratic side. As to the latter, of course, Mr. Bryan's wishes are being consulted, and since not even the closest friend of the Nebraskan here feels certain that he desires to again assume responsibility for the leadership of his party in such a political crisis as is now threatened, the belief is growing that in due season Mr. Bryan will unmistakably indicate his willingness to step aside.

CONSTABLES KILLED.

RENO, Nev., Oct. 19.—Two Nevada constables were shot and killed Wednesday by gamblers in small Nevada towns. Constable Gilbert of Ely was killed by Charles Sanders, when he attempted to interfere with Sanders, who was cruelly beating his wife.

Constable Kennedy of Palisade, was shot and killed by a man named Brooks, whom he was trying to put under arrest. Brooks tried to take a big sum of money away from a woman he had been living with. She refused to give it up and he started to beat her. When Kennedy came on the scene Brooks shot him through the heart. He then turned the revolver to his own head and sent a bullet through his brain.

WASHINGTON, Oct. 19.—Pre-eminence in trade, the United States is beginning to contest with the older countries in the realms of science and education. This fact is brought strikingly home this week through an announcement made by the George Washington University authorities that applications for admission to the different departments of the institution have been received from Egypt, Siam, Germany, China, Japan, the Philippines and Central and South America. Among the students are representatives from Australia and other countries as far removed.

This tendency shown by those of the older civilizations to sit at the feet of the masters of the new is considered remarkable. It is being fostered, however, for the presence of students from abroad in the universities of the country will go a long way toward insuring the future peace of the world. Every foreign student, once graduated, becomes in a measure an agent for good in this direction, and the United States gains advocates in other lands with no expense to itself.

Through the opportunity afforded in Washington for study of democratic institutions the universities here are being encouraged to gain as many foreign students as possible. The national capital is rich in stores of information, and the machinery of the government provides a plain object lesson of the beauties of a republic. Such study inevitably tends to inculcation of the desirability of free institutions, and goes far toward spreading the theory of the brotherhood of man and the duties of nations.

In fact, the presence of such students in American colleges and universities is likely to do more for the cause of world peace than all the congresses yet held at The Hague. The mixture of many different nationalities also has its advantages, for it gives to the American students a wider field of observation and extends and broadens his knowledge of foreign conditions. It is of as much importance to the native as it is to the stranger and this fact is being recognized more and more by American educators.

While similar conditions are to be found on the increases in practically every American college and university of standing, they are especially noticeable in the George Washington University. This is probably because the local institution is determined to become the national institution of learning, where graduates from other schools in this country and students from abroad may undertake graduate and research work. The local university is striving to achieve the position pointed out by the Father of His Country in his last will, and for which he left a tidy sum as the nucleus for an endowment fund.

The relations between the university and the South American countries are growing closer each year. W. A. Reid, a graduate of the Department of Law, has been appointed special representative to the Latin-American nations and will leave this month for South America for a year's trip through the various countries, during which he will explain the advantages to be gained by a course of study in the capital of the United States.

Only last week a party of Brazilian business men made an exhaustive examination of the university. As a result, there is almost certain to be a big delegation of students from that country next year.

NEARLY SHARED HUSBAND'S FATE.

MINEOLA, Oct. 19.—Mrs. William Luhrs, widow of a wealthy farmer of this place, who was killed by a Long Island Railroad train a year ago, had a narrow escape from meeting a similar fate when a carriage, in which she was driving home with two women friends this morning, was struck by an automobile. The women were thrown from the vehicle and badly bruised.
